Embargoed Release Policy for Publication of Master's Theses and Doctoral Dissertations

The creative work contained within a thesis or dissertation is an important contribution to scholarship. Disseminating a thesis or dissertation to a broad audience is a responsibility to the field shared by both the university and the student.

The College of Graduate Studies requires that all theses and dissertations be made publicly available through the University of Idaho Electronic Repository and through ProQuest/UMI. All works will be made public immediately upon the completion of the degree. If there are exceptional circumstances surrounding the electronic release of the thesis or dissertation a student may choose to delay (embargo) the release by up to two years. An embargo will delay the electronic release of the document but will not delay the release of the citation or abstract of the work. Reasons for an embargo could include:

- A plan to publish articles in journals that prohibit the publication of material that is available electronically.
- The reasonable expectation that a version of the thesis or dissertation could be published as a book with an academic or commercial publisher.
- Plans to submit an application for patents on research contained in a thesis or dissertation that may contain intellectual property with commercial value.
- A need to prevent disclosure of sensitive or classified information.

An embargo requesting a delayed release outside of two years will require the student and major professor submit a statement to COGS outlining the extenuating and exceptional circumstances which would be compelling enough to allow for an extended embargo. The request must be in writing, signed by the student and major professor, and submitted to the dean of COGS.
