OVERVIEW

Employment law regulates the employee-employer relationship including issues such as employment discrimination, fair employment practices, safety and health issues under the Occupational Safety Health Act, determining a worker’s status, worker’s compensation and employment-at-will. Research in employment law utilizes case law, state and federal statutes and regulations and local ordinances.

Labor law is more narrowly focused on regulating labor relations issues such as hours of labor, wages, unemployment insurance, leave and holidays, minimum wage and collective bargaining. Research in labor law primarily utilizes federal case law, statutes, regulations and administrative adjudications.

Print materials on employment and labor law are found between call numbers KF3315 - KF3615.

BNA and CCH LOOSELEAF SERVICES

Two in-depth print publications covering broad areas of employment and labor law are the Bureau of National Affairs (BNA) Labor Relations Reporter and the Commerce Clearing House (CCH) Labor Law Reporter. The publications are called “looseleaf services” because they are kept in looseleaf binders that are regulated updated by discarding outdated materials and inserting new materials. Characteristics of the looseleaf services include:

1. Multiple volumes divided by subject.
2. Advance sheet system that collects recent court and administrative decisions.
3. Advance sheets bound into a reporter for specific time periods, i.e. yearly.
4. A detailed indexing system.
5. Regular updating of materials.
6. A weekly update service to keep track of breaking news.
